Santa Fe Shangri-la

It is a Tibetan custom to offer five gifts, called the Five Graces, to a holy man in exchange for blessings before traveling. The gifts celebrate the five human senses, preparing the way to experience a journey to its fullest.

The Inn of the Five Graces lives up to its name as a delight to all of the senses. The Inn consists of several 100 year old adobe buildings and a 1938 stone house surrounding a group of interconnected courtyards designed to create numerous private retreats for guests. The resulting impression is of an exclusive residential enclave, cloistered from the bustling tourism of Santa Fe's alleyways and Plaza.

There are 22 romantic and luxurious suites, not just decorated but furnished and constructed with ornate Asian tapestries, Kilim rugs, louvers, tile mosaics, hand-hewn furniture, carved doors and shutters, intricate metalwork and inlays, antique pottery and art from over 13 countries around the world.

Each unique multiroom suite opens into parlors, dining rooms, living rooms, kitchens and tiled baths. It is exotic and intimate — as if you have stepped into an Oriental fable where you are the favored guest of a wealthy potentate.

The truly royal treatment is fully realized when you climb into your bed covered by hand-sewn 212-count Egyptian and Belgian cotton-fitted sheets. The mattress and featherbed are specially designed and manufactured by the Inn's parent company, The Garrett Group, and delivers the ultimate in sleep comfort.

Turndown service includes some of Santa Fe's finest cookies and Native American dream catchers and fetishes carved from semiprecious stones to ensure pleasant dreams, good luck and protection during your stay. It's like being visited by the tooth fairy every night.

Overwhelming sights, the smells of sage and aromatic spices, the sound of cloistered silence and the touch of luxury — the rooms themselves are a delight to the physical senses that the Inn is named after. But that is only the beginning of the Inn of the Five Graces experience, because General Manager Niall Reid brings a healthy dose of the sixth sense to the Inn by anticipating your every desire.

About a week before your arrival, you can expect a telephone call from Reid with questions about any special needs you may have: what special food and drink you might want in the already well-

Guests are invited daily to enlightening afternoon walks with Reid through the narrow streets of Santa Fe, culminating in a relaxed wine affair in one of the Inn's beautiful courtyards. He never forgets a name, and once he learns what your interests are, he's ready to individualize your Santa Fe experience with some inside knowledge or connection. For instance, if you are an art lover, Reid will tell you that Santa Fe's finest art collection is not housed in any of the local galleries or museums — it's in the State Capitol Building just around the corner.

In fact, the main goal at the Inn of the Five Graces seems to be finding some unique way for each guest to experience Santa Fe. For instance, the staff can arrange for a backstage tour of the Santa Fe Opera (the wig room is the most fun). And the Inn offers sensory delight adventures, such as a "Sight" program where you receive all-day individual photography instruction from a professional photographer at the Santa Fe Workshops and a "Taste" class with chef John Vollertsen
